

The FCC Chairman intends to reverse net neutrality rules and put big Internet Service Providers in charge of the internet.

I am firmly against this action, because these ISPs will operate solely in their own interests and not in the public interest. They will be able to restrict access to content from competitors, negative content about their own performance, and political or social views they disagree with. They can destroy the consumer market of creative new TV providers that have revitalized television programming in recent years and force consumer back to their tired cable programming. Reversing net neutrality protections will destroy an engine for innovation, growth, and communication.

The internet is the modern equivalent of the Town Square, and should be protected as part of our right to free speech. Consumers, small businesses, and all Americans deserve an open internet.
